

I understand that the FCC is considering a ruling that would invalidate Wisconsin's "do not call" law. The law as enacted in Wisconsin has been highly effective and it is extremely popular as evidenced by the high percentage of residents who have signed up for it. In fact, according to news reports shortly after the law went into effect, the chief executives of several tele-marketing companies signed up to be placed on the list. States should have the latitude to have stricter laws.